PATIENT
PORTRAITS FROM A DOCTOR'S REPERTOIRE
By Chris Reid

The photographs were compiled over a two-year period when Reid asked his patients if he could photograph them following their consultation. Reid's work varies from beautifully rendered sensitive studies to the more pragmatic-looking portraits you might expect to achieve on a decent handheld device these days. For my eye this doesn't detract from the book; rather, it helps to set its pace and adds another layer, hinting at the relationship between the photographer/doctor and his subjects/patients.

For the most part Reid's portraits have the subjects/patients making direct eye contact with the camera. It works effectively for the book, as you can't help but pause and search for the story that lies behind. The captions and a smattering of short stories that append the photographs neatly reveal the heart of ongoing health issues, or reasons why the subjects/patient has ended up in Reid's surgery and in front of this lens.

From arthritic hips to ear infections, cancers to itchy bites, we all understand how our state of health affects our lives. The real beauty of Patient is the diversity of the kōwhiri common to humanity captured within its pages that will leave you both touched and feeling a little bit more connected to the world.

MĀORI ART FOR KIDS

Review nā Liz Brown

This is a fantastic resource book whether you are a primary school teacher, a parent looking for holiday activities, or a budding young artist looking for inspiration. The book provides a collection of 15 different art projects focused on Māori art and culture. With each project there is a brief resume of the leading contemporary artist (including our own Areta Wilkinson) and the taonga that inspired the project. An explanation of the taonga and its use in both the past and the present enhances the educative value of this book. The traditional and contemporary materials used are also described. Norm Heke's wonderful photography of each of the taonga adds another dimension, making it more than just a "how to do it" type of book.

Step-by-step instructions are supported by illustrations of young artists undertaking the projects, and the taonga that they finally create. It provides enough detail so even those who are not confident would find it easy to follow. The projects use everyday art and craft items along with recycled and found objects, making it budget friendly. It also provides applications of the art form.

So whether you are interested in collage, design, painting, sculpture, photography or mixed media there will be something to appeal to you. The projects are suitable for both boys and girls, and the whole whānau can be involved too!

He rawe te kite i tēnei tino pukapuka-pikitia kua whakamāoritā, te pai hoki o te reo Māori. Kiore e kore ka mohio koutou te huka mātua ki te kaupapa o te pukapuka nei. I tētahi āta mahana ka haere tāhi hōa ki te hōe i te whaka. Ka ekea te waka e te kau, te kaihe, te hipi, te poaka me tētahi punua kiore. Ko wai te karanga taunaha rawo? Nā wai te waka i totohu?

It's terrific to see these two picture books translated into te reo kaitiaki. They are wonderful stories to be read to and by your tamariki/mokopuna. They will enjoy figuring out which animal Pūrewhia thinks is being described in Kei Hea Taku Māmā? and the difference between it and Makimaki's mother. In Nā Wai Te Waka I Totohu? your tamariki will have fun thinking about which animal will sink the boat. The translations are delightful and you will have fun reading them aloud.
